Indigenous Women Transforming Communities

Leading for a Lasting Impact

Our Mission

The Women's Justice Initiative (WJI) improves the lives of indigenous Guatemalan women and girls through education, access to legal services, and gender-based violence prevention.

Letter from Our Leadership

Kate Flatley

Executive Director

Clara Ferraro

Board President

Dear Friends,

We are thrilled to share that 2022 was a year of progress and growth in which we hit extraordinary milestones and celebrated a Decade of Success!

In 2011, we began as a team of two, working in one community with fifteen participants. To date, more than 10,000 women and girls have participated in our programs, and we have reached nearly 50,000 individuals directly. In 2022 our team grew to thirty-three staff members and our work now spans across three countries. In Guatemala, we provided 1,428 free legal services to over 800 women. More than 1,300 women and girls participated in our programs, and we welcomed twenty-two new women to our network of Community Advocates. Regionally, we collaborated with individuals from 155 civil society organizations, sharing knowledge and technical assistance.

As a team, we celebrated the achievements of the last decade and began to define ambitious organizational goals for the future. Recognizing that sustainable growth must be guided by local expertise and informed by our past experience, last year we created an Impact and Learning team which is dedicated to ensuring that our work has a lasting impact that will transform communities.

We are filled with immense gratitude as we reflect on the work we have accomplished together in our ongoing mission to end gender-based violence and improve the lives of women and girls in rural, indigenous communities. While we celebrate our accomplishments from the last ten years, we eagerly look forward to the next decade.

Thank you for being a critical part of our success.

Sincerely,
Kate and Clara

The Context

Guatemala has one of the highest rates of violence against women and girls in the world. Rural, indigenous women are disproportionately impacted by violence due to social isolation, discrimination, weak public institutions, and limited access to resources.

Indigenous Guatemalan girls face an especially high risk of child marriage as gender norms and a lack of educational and economic opportunities push young girls to get married.

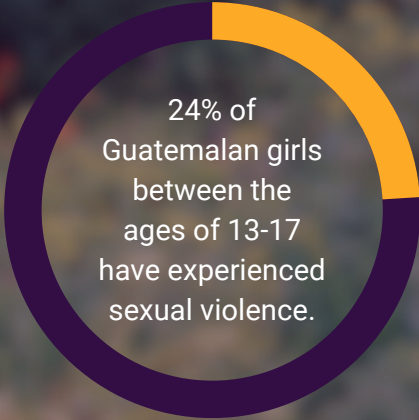

53% of all femicides committed in Central America occurred in Guatemala.

1 in 3 indigenous women who live with a man experience violence.

Less than 2% of legal cases involving violence against women and girls result in a judgment.

24% of Guatemalan girls between the ages of 13-17 have experienced sexual violence.

30% of indigenous girls are married by age 18.

Where We Work

WJI works in 73 rural, Maya Kaqchikel communities across six municipalities in Guatemala. Through its regional expansion, WJI is sharing its methodology and providing technical assistance to civil society organizations in Honduras, Mexico, and three additional regions of Guatemala.

WJI Program Participants

On average, adult participants were married by age 20 and had their first child by age 21.

15% of mothers are single parents.

94% work in the informal labor market.

79% speak Maya Kaqchikel.

What We Do

WJI envisions a world in which women and girls are active leaders in their communities, have access to legal services, know their rights, and can live free from violence. To achieve this goal, WJI employs a comprehensive approach that is driven by community-based solutions and offered in the local language.

WJI provides free legal support in cases related to violence against women and girls and economic rights, and works with government entities and community actors to strengthen institutional responses to survivors of violence.

The Women's Rights Education Program, a legal literacy and empowerment course, teaches women about their rights and helps them to build the necessary skills to exercise and protect those rights.

To sustain our impact, WJI trains local women to become Community Advocates, or rights educators and mentors in their communities.

Advocates lead the Adolescent Girls Program which improves girls' knowledge of their rights and helps them to delay marriage.

2022 Highlight: 10-Year Anniversary Event

In 2022 WJI celebrated a Decade of Success. We commemorated the occasion with members of our team, our dedicated board, and new and long-standing partners.

Our inspiring honorees, Luis von Ahn and Kim Koopersmith, are two trailblazers and leaders in their industries, dedicated to improving the lives of women and girls and promoting social justice.

We are so grateful to everyone who helped make our anniversary, and the last ten years, a resounding success!

Regional Expansion Highlight

WJI in Mesoamerica

WJI is a regional partner with the Women's Economic Empowerment in Mesoamerica Initiative, funded by USAID, which aims to reduce gender-based violence and human trafficking. WJI provides training and technical assistance to community-based organizations in Mexico, Guatemala, and Honduras, helping them to adapt WJI's legal empowerment methodology to their local context. Collaborating with sustainable, women-led initiatives across the region builds upon WJI's success creating stronger, safer communities in Guatemala and sets the foundation for regional growth.

Regional Expansion Highlight

Rosa Xocoxic (Paralegal) and Rut Curruchich (Outreach Coordinator) lead the project. The women boast thirty years of combined experience in gender-based violence response and prevention, women's rights advocacy, and community development. Rosa and Rut understand the unique barriers that indigenous women face, both through personal experience as Maya Kaqchikel women and through their extensive work serving indigenous communities.

Regional Expansion Highlight

Rosa says, “It’s been a real challenge, though a rewarding one, to work in diverse contexts.” Most recently, through comprehensive legal research and conversations with local experts, Rosa and Rut adapted WJI’s methodology to reflect the specific experience of indigenous women in Southern Mexico. “Mexico has a more advanced legal framework regarding women’s rights, but rural, indigenous women there face barriers to accessing justice.”

Rosa and Rut report that the women who participate in the workshops are enthusiastic to learn about their rights, and willing to discuss the violence they see in their communities. Rut states, “We have not gone a single day without participants sharing with us about cases of violence.”

A person's hand, wearing a ring and a beaded bracelet, points to a colorful map on a table. The map shows various regions and is surrounded by other items like a water bottle, a glass, and a pitcher. The background is a blue tablecloth.

Regional Expansion Highlight

Rosa and Rut look for solutions based on local practices. For example, women in Oaxaca mentioned the traditional practice of tequio, where members of indigenous communities donate their time or resources to improve the community. Rosa and Rut immediately recognized tequio as analogous to a Maya Kaqchikel equivalent, called faena. From there, the WJI team and the Oaxacan women launched a plan to incorporate legal services and accompaniment into this traditional practice.

Regional Expansion Highlight

WJI's proven methodology underscores the importance of seeking solutions based on culturally relevant practices and the knowledge of community members. Designing effective programming rooted in local expertise and experience is what makes WJI a regional leader in advancing justice for indigenous women and girls.

Setting Precedents

WJI's Legal Team Triumphs in School Sexual Abuse Case

In many of the rural, indigenous communities where WJI works, sexism and discrimination prevent survivors of violence from reporting abuse or accessing the legal system. Guatemala has some of the highest rates of impunity for violence against women in the world – 98% of sexual assault and femicide cases go unpunished. In 2022, WJI's legal team won an unprecedented judgment, representing an eleven-year-old girl, who was sexually assaulted by her teacher. The case demonstrated to the survivor and the community that the law can be a powerful tool, and that sexual abusers can be held accountable for their crimes.

Setting Precedents

Upon learning about the assault from her daughter, the mother of the young girl immediately reported it to the school director. Instead of taking action, the school pressured her to stay silent. Individuals approached her with bribes trying to convince her not to report the assault, but she had no intention of being silenced by her daughter's abuser and sought assistance from WJI. With WJI's guidance and legal accompaniment, the mother and daughter reported the crime to law enforcement.

Setting Precedents

Throughout the criminal trial, the family faced criticism and were ostracized by their community. They were told to leave their home, and the mother was ridiculed for “exaggerating” what happened to her daughter. Her daughter faced bullying at school and each hearing proved emotionally taxing. Many times, the mother wondered if the trial was worth it.

Setting Precedents

With WJI's help, the mother and daughter stood firm in their decision to seek justice. WJI's legal team provided comprehensive legal support, including accompaniment to submit evidence for the trial, cross examination preparation, legal advice related to process, and referrals to receive psychological counseling. The mother credits WJI's emotional and legal support as the reason they continued with the trial despite the backlash they received.

Setting Precedents

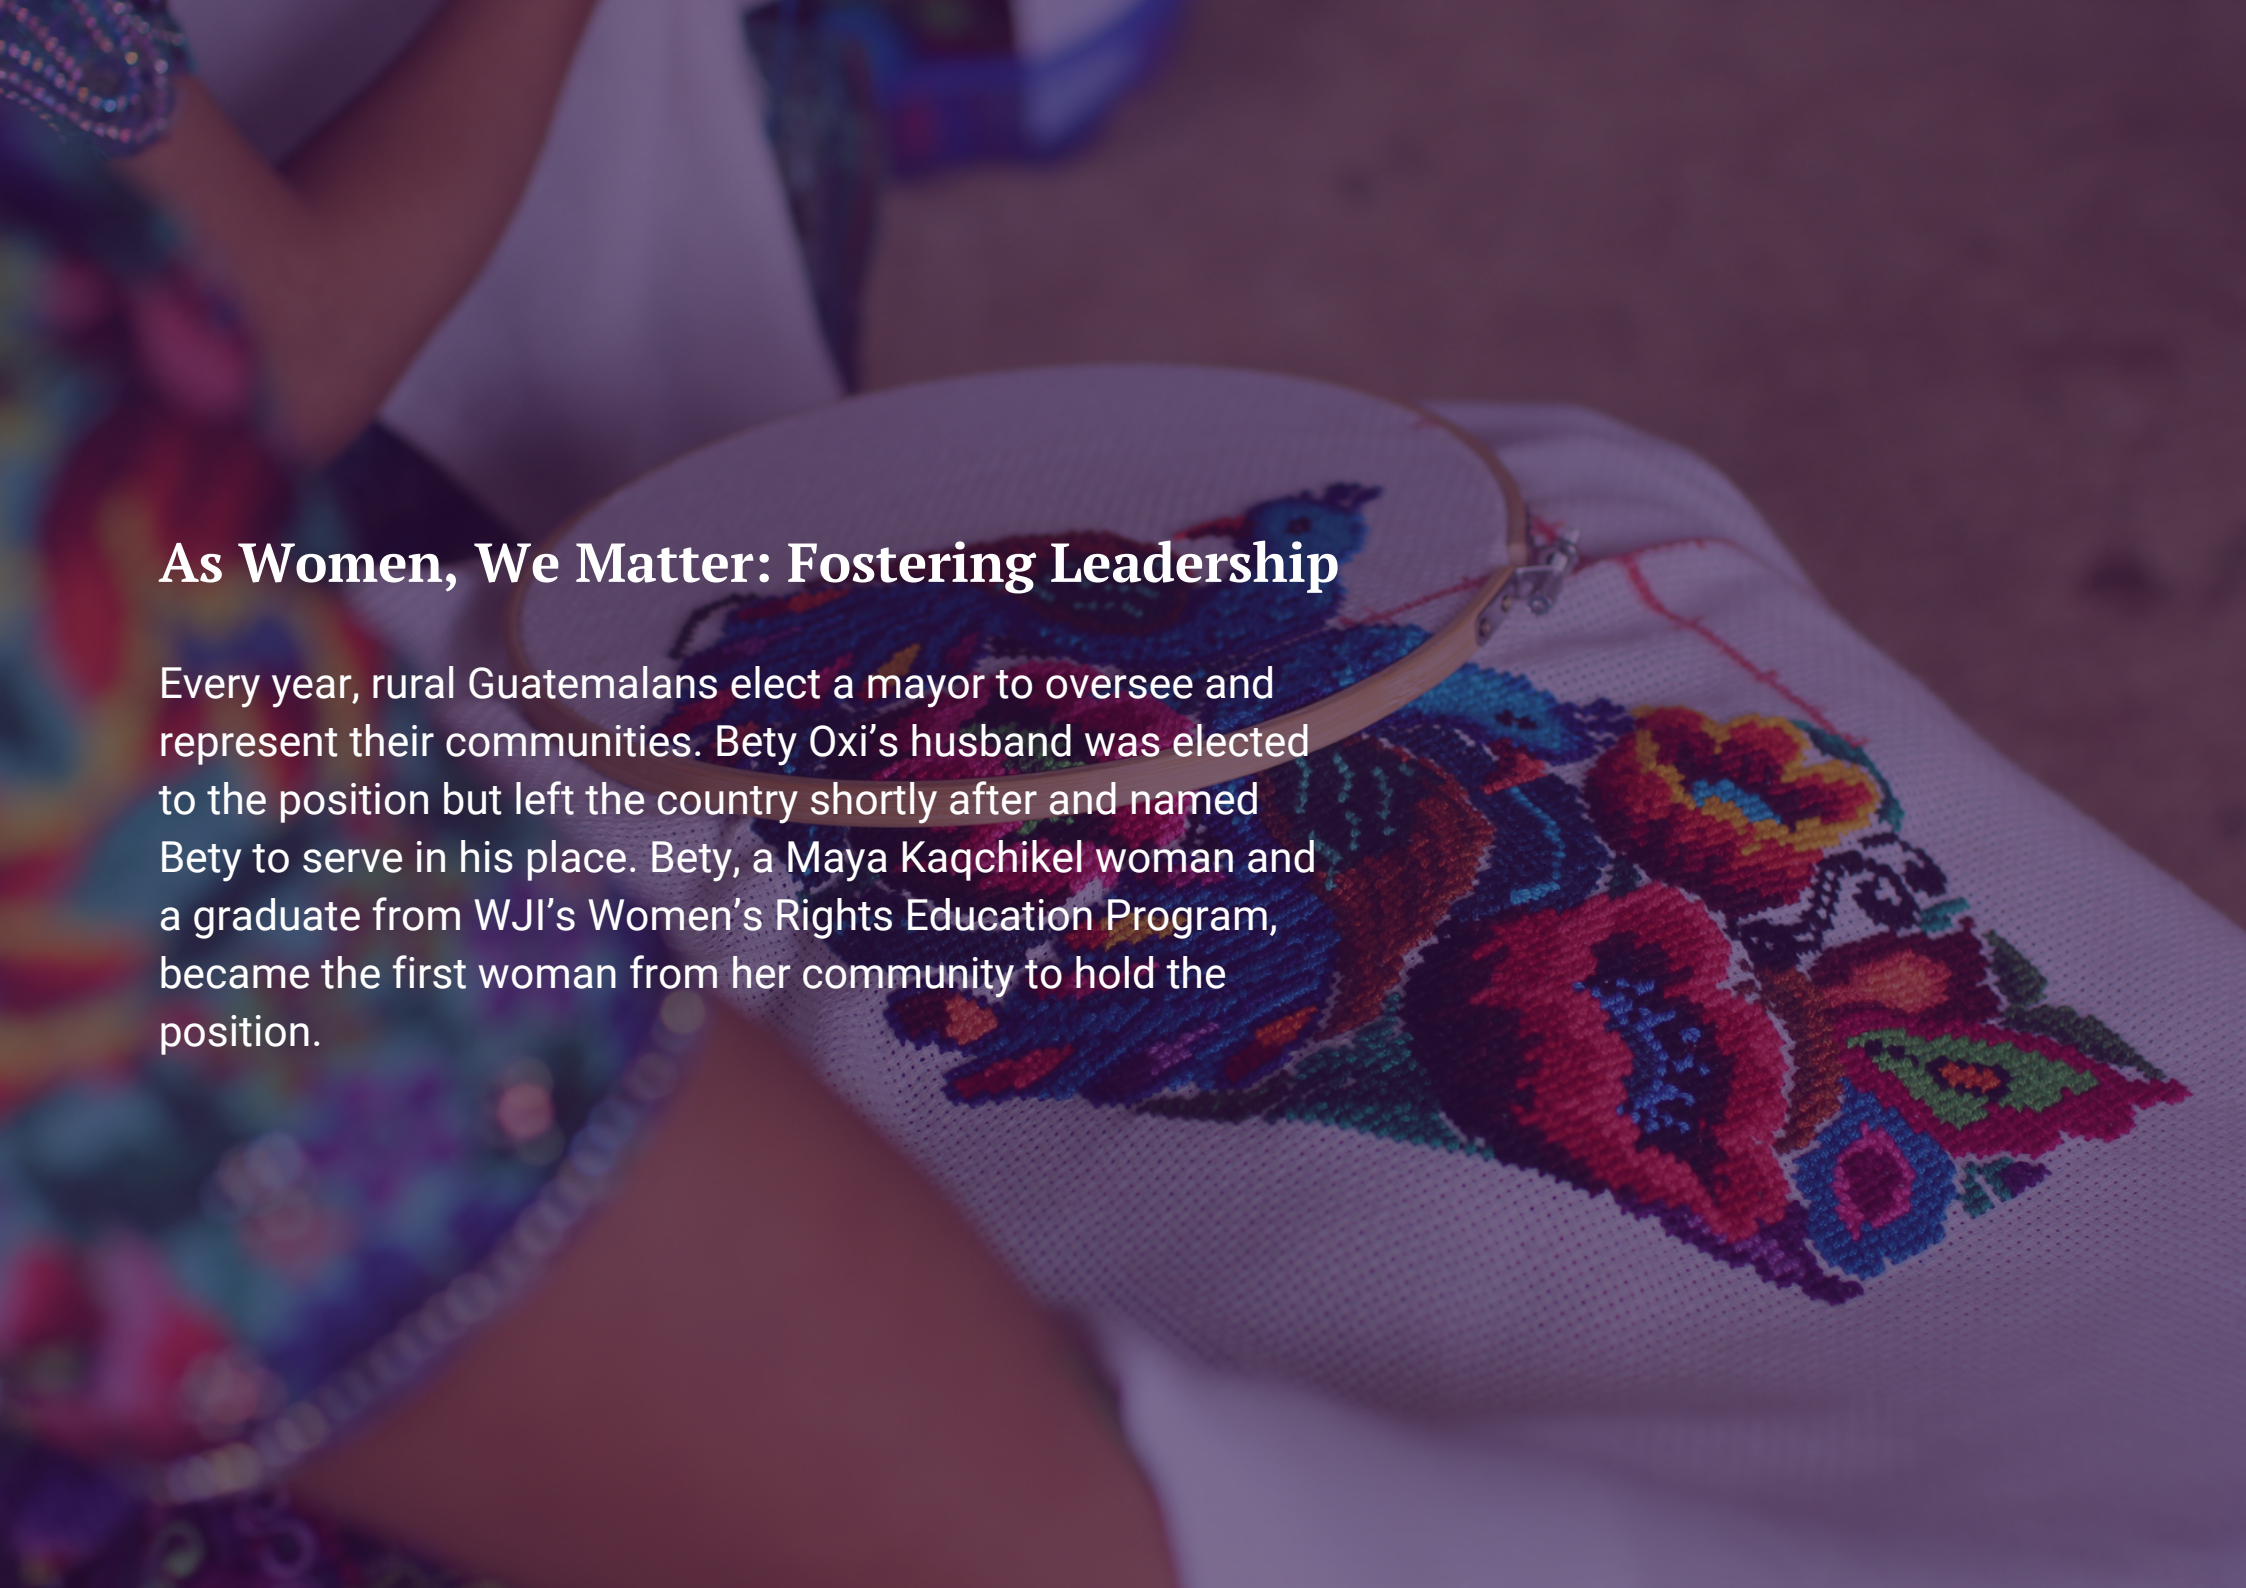

In October 2022, the court found the teacher guilty and sentenced him to 11 years in prison, the maximum sentence for the crime and the defendant was ordered to pay reparations to the survivor. The judge also mandated that the local Ministry of Education train administrators, teachers, students, and parents on recognizing and reporting sexual violence.

As Women, We Matter: Fostering Leadership

Bety Oxi García: Community Mayor

Maya women continue to be excluded from political participation in Guatemala; 20% of the recently elected Congress is composed of women, of which only one is an indigenous woman. WJI builds women's leadership skills, confidence, and knowledge of their rights, so that more women can participate in local decision-making, begin to shift social norms, and transform their communities.

As Women, We Matter: Fostering Leadership

Every year, rural Guatemalans elect a mayor to oversee and represent their communities. Bety Oxi's husband was elected to the position but left the country shortly after and named Bety to serve in his place. Bety, a Maya Kaqchikel woman and a graduate from WJI's Women's Rights Education Program, became the first woman from her community to hold the position.

As Women, We Matter: Fostering Leadership

As the only woman among eleven elected officials, Bety's success in the role illustrates what women can accomplish when they feel empowered to participate in leadership roles. Bety says that recognizing her self-worth is one of the greatest lessons learned from WJI's workshops, "as women, we matter." She notes that before participating in WJI's programs, she believed she had no value.

As Women, We Matter: Fostering Leadership

Machista and patriarchal attitudes are prevalent in rural Guatemala and for Bety, occupying a public position has been a challenge. She has faced criticism that targets not just her abilities as a leader, but the simple fact that she is a woman. She says that if she had not received training from WJI, she would have never been brave enough to serve in public office. A testament to her determination, Bety has built strong relationships with her male colleagues, who support and encourage her.

The child on the right is wearing a blue top and a colorful, patterned skirt. The child in the foreground is wearing a blue top and white leggings. The background is a light-colored stone wall with a large archway. The image has a soft, slightly faded appearance.

As Women, We Matter: Fostering Leadership

Bety is succeeding in a role traditionally reserved for men and she has done so with confidence and courage. She says she feels fortunate that women in her community now see her as a role model.

“Women look at me and think that they can do it too, they get excited and say that they think about running for public office.”

Cultivating Relationships, Strengthening Institutions

Interview with the District Attorney in San Juan Comalapa

WJI partners with government officials and service providers to strengthen referral pathways for survivors of violence and to improve resources for rural, indigenous women. In San Juan Comalapa, WJI has established a valuable relationship with the public prosecutor's office. WJI sat down with the head of the office, District Attorney David Rosales López, who reflected on the importance of the services provided by WJI and the impact generated by building the capacity of local institutions.

A group of women in colorful traditional Mexican dresses are gathered around a woman who is speaking into a microphone. The woman speaking is wearing a vibrant, multi-colored floral dress. She is holding a microphone and appears to be addressing the group. The women around her are also wearing similar traditional dresses with intricate patterns and colors. The background shows a simple room with a whiteboard and a wooden lattice partition. The overall atmosphere is one of a community meeting or a presentation.

Cultivating Relationships, Strengthening Institutions

WJI invests in relationships with local authorities and community leaders, which strengthens the coordination among entities and improves the municipalities holistic response to survivors of violence. District Attorney López views WJI as an indispensable resource for the municipality, stating “WJI is well known in rural communities...and is recognized for its work with government institutions and organizations in the municipal protection network... Community leaders refer women to WJI and women who don’t have economic resources know they can get free legal help.”

Cultivating Relationships, Strengthening Institutions

“WJI helps women who are trapped in cycles of violence, women who need personalized attention, and whose financial means limit their ability to hire an attorney,” explains López. When women seek assistance from government entities they face many challenges, including limited services, linguistic barriers, and bureaucratic processes. WJI’s presence means that these offices can now refer women to an organization where they receive support from women who speak their language and who can help them navigate a complicated judicial system. “It’s important for women to know that they are not alone.”

A group of approximately 15 women and one young child are sitting on the floor in a room, listening attentively. They are dressed in traditional, colorful, patterned clothing. The room has white walls and a window with a white frame. The lighting is soft and even.

Cultivating Relationships, Strengthening Institutions

López believes patriarchal social norms are one of the biggest challenges to addressing violence against women and girls and acknowledges that the prosecutor's office has a hard time raising awareness. "This society is machista, about 35% of the complaints we receive are related to gender-based violence. We do give talks about prevention, but it's not prioritized." López commends WJI's focus on training municipal service providers and engaging men and community leaders, acknowledging that sensitivity training and education are key to preventing gender-based violence.

A group of women, likely from a rural community in Comalapa, are standing in a line outdoors. They are wearing traditional, vibrant, and intricately patterned clothing, including blouses and skirts. The women have serious expressions, and some have their hands clasped in front of them. The background shows a simple building with white walls and arches. The overall scene suggests a formal or significant gathering.

Cultivating Relationships, Strengthening Institutions

“WJI has had a positive impact on women and has been a great help to Comalapa,” not just ensuring that women can protect themselves, but by shifting broader attitudes that will lead to transformative change.
